

THE VALUE OF FOREIGN LANGUAGE IN THE CONTEXT OF GLOBALIZATION

Holubiev Borys Oleksandrovych

Scientific Advisor – Shevchenko V.I., Assistant Professor

Kharkiv Educational and Scientific Institute

SHEI “University of Banking”

Globalization is a process of the integration of different cultures, languages, organizations, countries, etc. from across the globe. The issues of social and technical interdependence among the countries are solved by implementing Globalization.

English has become the main language, operating in the international arena, the language of diplomacy, business, tourism and culture, and the world economy and politics, education and science, technology and law. In view of this, it is important to form the special vocabulary of English in the context of a degree of future economists. To date, the scope of business in our country is characterized by high rates of development. In this regard, there is a need to study foreign languages, their application in practice for economic cooperation with foreign countries, as well as for work in foreign firms.

Professional education demands new approaches in modern conditions of globalization, political and economical changes. Processes of the reformation in society influenced the new status of foreign language as a subject.

Many scientists devoted their research works to this problem. Crystal D. the author of “English as a Global Language” argues that “to achieve a global status, a language has to be taken up by other countries around the world either as an official language or as a priority in a country’s foreign language teaching”. Chew P. the author of “Linguistic Imperialism, globalism and the English language” says that a “lack of a command in English would mean the continued marginalization of their children in a world that would continue to use the language to a greater degree. It would also deny they access to the extensive resources available in English – resources which have developed as a consequence of globalization”.

Thus, globalization establishes faster linkage among nations, which aids in shared knowledge and information that are generated at particular part of the countries to other part of the countries.

References

1. Crystal, D. English as a Global Language. 2nd Ed. Cambridge: Cambridge University press, - 2003.
2. Chew, P. Linguistic Imperialism, globalism and the English language. In D. Graddol & U. Meinhof, English in a changing world [AILA Review 13]. United Kingdom, - 1999.